Description

HISTORY OF WORLD WAR II FIGHTER SUPERMARINE SPITFIRE

Discover the single-seater English warplane or fighter used by the Royal Air Force (RAF) and by many other Allied nations during World War 2: Supermarine Spitfire. This fabulous creation, powered by the Rolls Royce Merlin engine of 1030 HP (768 Kw), remained flying until the 50s in front line hunting and secondary functions. It was the only warplane that was manufactured during the entire war conflict.

The Supermarine Spitfire was designed by R. J. Mitchell, and continued to improve the details of the plane until he died of cancer back in 1941, at which time he replaced his colleague Joseph Smith.

For many characteristics, the elliptical wing of the Spitfire fighter counted on a first transverse section that allowed him to reach a top speed higher than several fighters of the time. Characteristics presented for the national defense against the enemy battleships.

After the success of the Battle of England, the Spitfire fighter became the essential piece of the RAF and participated in the war zone of Europe, the Pacific and Southeast Asia as an interceptor, photo-reconnaissance, fighter-bomber, embarked fighter and trainer.
